Do you ride roller coasters? Love that rush when your stomach drops to your feet and then bounces up to knock the air out of your lungs? Do you play rough, tough, and tumble games? Ski? Snow Board? Surf? Dive from the high diving board? Do you love scary movies?

Or is your idea of excitement a quiet walk up the beach? Playing catch with a small dog? Watching the latest Disney Pixar, tear jerkers that end happily, or romantic comedies that leave your starry eyed?

Either way when your kids enter the teens you are going to worry a bit, because one or the other type will rule.

Some kids swing from the roof tops, others only in a hammock and then very slowly. The hammock kid is less worrisome. This survival guide for parents of teenagers is for the parents of the roof top swinger.

Most likely he or she has already broken a bone or two or more or wears a number of battle scars. Just thinking about handing over the car keys to this one gives you shivers and nightmares. What to do?

The first advice given by Katherine Gordy Levine is to accept that you have limited control over anything but your own emotions. If you are a risk taker, you will deal with a risk-taking child a bit better than if you are the live-a-safe life type. Either one must stay in control of their emotions. If you can't sleep nights for worrying, you are not in control. The second step involves damage control. You need to do all you can to keep the kid out of the emergency room. This survival guide helps with both tasks.

Katherine Gordy Levine is not only a licensed therapist, former professor, and director of mental health crisis teams, she and her husband have cared for over three hundred foster children, mostly teens and each in trouble with the law. Her suggestions are both clinically sound, but also based on practical experience. She knows what works and what doesn't work. Moreover, she is on the side of all parents.

A prolific writer, Katherine's 'When Good Kids Do Bad Things' series offers digestible survival guides for parents on various topics.
